

About the Authors

Jessica Owley is a professor of environmental law, federal Indian law, property, and land conservation at the SUNY Buffalo Law School. She received her Ph.D. in Environmental Science, Policy and Management from the University of California-Berkeley and her J.D. from Berkeley Law. Her research examines land conservation and climate change with a particular focus on private lands and conservation easements. Before entering academia, she practiced in the Land Use and Environment Law group at Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco. Prior to private practice, Prof. Owley clerked for Hon. Harry Pregerson of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and Hon. Dean D. Pregerson of the Central District of California.

Keith Hirokawa is an associate professor at Albany Law School where he teaches courses involving environmental and natural resources law, land use planning, property law, and jurisprudence. His scholarship has explored convergences in ecology, ethics, economics, and law, with particular attention given to local environmental law, ecosystem services policy, watershed management, and environmental impact analysis. He has authored dozens of professional and scholarly articles and books in these areas, including Environmental Law and Contrasting Ideas of Nature (2014) and Greening Local Government (2012, co-edited with Dean Patricia Salkin).
